The Bi-Monthly Catalog of New England's Ancient & World Coin Division

World Coin Division Steps Up Activity

New England Rare Coin Galleries' World Coin Division is gearing up for an unusually busy fall season. Our staff of experts will participate in a number of upcoming shows over the next few months, which will help us serve you in two distinct ways. At each of these events, our professionals will offer hundreds of superb specimens expected to please both the date and type collector. At the Long Beach II Sale, for example, scheduled October 1-3 in Long Beach, California, New England's ancient and world offerings will include more than 270 lots. Many of these specimens are in exceptional condition, and a number are rarely offered on the marketplace.

By attending several different shows, our professionals will also be better able to keep abreast of the burgeoning world coin market. Our fall schedule, for instance, includes the Tigurum Fall Show, slated October 17-18, in Zurich, Switzerland. Here we expect to keep close tabs on European buyers, who are a major force in world coin trends.

In this issue of New England World Selections, you'll find an impressive array of coins, many of which were acquired at the recent 1981 American Numismatic Association Convention. Remember, however, that these listings are only a sampling of the material we have in inventory. If you don't see what you want, please feel free to call us, or send us your Want List.

This catalog also includes a detailed analysis of the world coin market trends revealed at the ANA convention, as well as an overview of some spectacular Japanese coins recently obtained by New England. Our special feature traces the colorful history of French coinage. We hope you find the articles informative.

The Coinage of France

By Deborah D. Bartlett

Long a favorite among collectors, French coinage has one of the most colorful histories in all of Europe. Over the past 2,000 years, the French monetary system has weathered a bewildering array of issues by hundreds of different tribes, cities, monarchies, empires and republics.

France's first official imperial mints were established in the last century B.C., when France — then Gaul — was conquered by the Romans. During the roughly 300 years of Roman rule, coinage consisted of actual Roman coins brought to Gaul by the legions garrisoned there, and of copies of those coins. Early copies were close enough to the originals to be almost indistinguishable from them. But by the time copies of copies were struck, any resemblance to the original was lost. These ancient French coins are readily available today, and are currently quite popular among collectors. Silver denominations sell for $75 and up, depending on rarity and condition, while a gold coin of the same period commands a minimum of $500.

With the eventual demise of Roman influence in Gaul, the country became parcelled out among three warring, barbarian kingdoms. Two of these were relatively short-lived, however, while the third, the Franks, gradually succeeded in uniting France under their rule. During this period, coinage became a reflection of feudal life. Unlike England, whose single monarchy spawned unified coinage, France had no central authority. As a result, various feudal lords, heads of church and of individual towns all issued their own coinage; a diversity that provides today's collectors with a wonderful record of life in feudal France.

Typical regal coinage of the feudal period features a royal profile and name on the obverse, and a Victory type or cross reverse. Since many kings of this era shared the same name, it's sometimes difficult to classify these coins chronologically. Coins issued by the church were similar in design to regal issues, with the notable exception that inscriptions were of monasteries or bishops. Particularly interesting among issues of this period are those of the Emperor Charlemagne (781-814). Most of the deniers issued by Charlemagne simply feature his monogram surrounded by his name and title. But some carry his profile on the obverse with a temple and the inscription Christiana Religio on the reverse. These latter coins commemorate Charlemagne's coronation as Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire on Christmas Day, 800. It is an indication of their historical significance that silver deniers issued by Charlemagne are currently valued at about $400, while those of lesser emperors of the same period sell for approximately $50.

After hundreds of years of splintered authority, French royalty finally began to assume more central control of the country during the reign of Louis IX (1226-1270). As feudal coinage became restricted to each specific feudal domain, regal coinage circulated throughout the realm. And, as more territories were united under the crown, feudal issues gradually dwindled. Louis IX's purpose in disseminating his coinage was clearly to increase his sphere of influence. The more his coinage was used in commerce, after all, the more his influence was likely to grow.

Improving economic conditions gradually led to the development of larger silver denominations and to the introduction of gold into the French regal series. This newfound prosperity suffered a setback, however, with the outbreak of the Hundred Years' War with England. Despite economic hardships resulting from the war, it was during these hundred years that the écu à la couronne, which was to become a standard gold coin, was introduced. The écu featured a crowned shield with three lis on the obverse, an ornate cross enclosed in arches and bordered by crowns on the reverse.

Finally, after a century of fighting, the French succeeded in banishing the English from all but Calais. As one measure to strengthen the recovering kingdom, Louis XI simplified the French monetary system, leaving the écu as the only remaining gold denomination, and reducing silver and billon coinage to just a few.

From the reign of Louis XII onward, French coinage began to shed its Medieval image and acquire more modern characteristics. For instance, a new silver piece, the teston, featured a realistic portrait that reflected Renaissance influence. Letters or dots began being used to signify mints, and the royal portrait was employed on gold coinage as well as silver. That was, at least, until religious strife hit the reign of Charles IX (1560-1574) and the royal portrait was omitted altogether for 50 years. Another innovation of this period was the addition of an issue date in both Roman and Arabic numerals. Coins had previously been dated only according to the reign in which they had been struck.

It was during the reign of Henry III (1574-1589), that the franc first made its appearance. The first francs portrayed the king in a neck ruff on the obverse, with his initial at the center of a cross on the reverse. These early silver francs are readily available today. Particularly popular among French collectors, they sell for about $50 to $100 apiece. Henry III's reign also marks the demise of hand-struck coinage in France. Both England and France had been experimenting with a machine strike, which both countries adopted at roughly the same time.

Throughout the years and under subsequent reigns, the French populace grew increasingly dissatisfied with royal pomposity and with their own unjust lot in life. Passions exploded with the French Revolution, which brought with it a radical change in existing coinage. As part of an overwhelming desire to change every aspect of the French government, the anti-royal backlash led to crude coinage with radically revised design and dating system. Dating was based on the founding of the First Republic which followed the Revolution in 1792. A coin struck three years into the Republic was therefore dated "L'An III de la Liberté."

When Napoleon first became emperor in 1806, his only immediate change to coinage of the First Republic was the addition of his new title. Eventually, though, he discontinued the inscription "Republique Francaise" and resumed dating coins by issue date. Because mintages were high, coins of this First Empire are still readily available today.

After Napoleon's defeat at Waterloo in 1814, France's monarchy was restored under Louis XVIII. Until the monarchy was again abolished in 1848 — this time permanently — coinage returned to the royal portrait obverse. These last royal portraits form a popular collector series.

With the expulsion of the monarchy, Napoleon's nephew, Louis Napoleon, took over as president of the Second Republic. Not satisfied with merely being president, he launched a coup d'état and declared himself emperor. Coinage of this period reflects the change, as Louis replaced the previous simple inscription of his name with "Napoleon III Empereur" on the obverse, "Empire Francais" on the reverse.

Later French coins continue to reflect the country's changing political and economic conditions. After World War I, for instance, the drift toward inflation was inexorable. Gold coinage ceased and smaller denomination francs were replaced by coins struck in aluminum-bronze. And in 1938, the 5-franc piece that had always been silver, became nickel.

French coinage also reflects France's pre-eminence in the world of art. In fact, the popular French design of "Le Semeuse" (The Sower) that appears on much French coinage, served as the inscription for our own Walking Liberty Half Dollar. Some critics contend that we were a bit too inspired; both coins depict Liberty striding toward a rising sun.

Most French coins currently available to collectors were struck in the past 300 years, from the time of Louis XIII onward. These coins span the 17th century, through the decadence of the late 18th century French court, past the French Revolution, to the current postwar governments. The earlier coins — struck in copper, bronze, brass, aluminum, nickel, silver and gold — are generally in good supply in lower grades, but are very elusive in better qualities. For example, a gold 20 franc of Napoleon Bonaparte in Fine condition is worth only a small premium above its actual gold content. If that same coin could be located in MS-65, however, it would probably sell for $2,000 or more.

World Coin Commentary

By Frank L. Garofalo

Director, Ancient & World Coin Division

With the American Numismatic Association Convention having just ended in New Orleans, this seems an appropriate time to analyze the current world coin market. Although many foreign dealers and collectors missed this year's show — both because of the heat of a New Orleans summer and because the convention fell during the traditional European vacation period — those dealers who had Choice material for sale maintained a brisk selling pace.

It was interesting to note that the demand for inexpensive numismatic gold coins has slowed somewhat. This is attributable to a "wait and see" attitude among dealers who are hoping to buy gold at its lowest ebb. Activity was very strong for Choice Mint State condition Swiss silver and gold coins. The early Swiss Cantonal coinage was in particular demand among both collectors and dealers. This demand was initiated by a growing realization of the true rarity of these coins in Mint State condition. Other areas of particular activity were Japanese gold and silver coins, Latin and South American gold coins, and German Weimar commemorative three and five-mark pieces.

One excellent means of tracking particular growth areas is the Standard Catalog of World Coins, published since 1973 by Krause Publications. The newly-released 1982 catalog reflects a great number of world coin price increases. The German section has been expanded to include many Proof mintages not previously published. There is also much more attention paid to three and five-mark commemorative issues of the Weimar Republic (1919 to 1933), many of which have increased by almost 100 percent in just one year. According to Krause, German minor coins of one pfennig to one mark denominations have made great gains in Uncirculated and Proof condition, as have German state issues from 1800 to 1872. The increased interest in state issues was long overdue, as this series had been woefully undervalued in previous catalogs. As a matter of fact, it has been standard practice for many World Coin dealers to purchase Mint State and Proof condition World Coins at several times the stated retail price. During the past two years, New England has paid up to ten times the stated catalog value for many rare and highly undervalued coins.

Krause Publications deserves a lot of credit for the clarity and scope of this one-volume reference on World Coins. While no resource of this magnitude can be totally free of errors, the Krause catalog comes very close to perfection. Each edition has been more comprehensive than the previous one. In short, I heartily recommend this annual catalog to anyone interested in World Coins.

Report From Japan

By Marc Emory

Director of Overseas Operations, NERCG

Having just returned from the Japanese Numismatic Dealers Association (JNDA) coin show in Tokyo, Japan, I am pleased to report that Japanese coinage is experiencing outstanding growth among both Japanese and American dealers.

In scouting the show for New England, I was particularly interested in purchasing modern Japanese coinage dating from 1870, the beginning of the rule of Emperor Meiji. A few Japanese dealers actually specialize in uncirculated modern Japanese coinage, but many others are interested in new issues — post 1960 — and/or European rarities. In fact, about five dealers asked me for "several" 1839 English Proof sets costing approximately $65,000 per set!

The current Japanese market for top-quality Japanese coinage reminds me of the American market for gem U.S. type coins in 1973. As happened in this country then, the Japanese currently have a shortage of gem quality coins, despite the fact that such specimens are relatively inexpensive in terms of their rarity. Even offers to raise the purchase price failed to unearth more coins for sale. One reason for this shortage is Japanese reluctance to sell their tangibles for a profit a few years after purchase. As a result, Choice silver one yens are nearly impossible to locate at any price. New England bought every gem Japanese silver coin from 1870 to 1920 that we saw. With real luck, I was able to purchase a gem original roll of 10 sen coins, and one of 50 sen coins. However, I found very few Choice silver five sen, 20 sen, and one yen coins.

One of my primary goals in Japan was to find enough Japanese gold coins in Choice condition to satisfy intense collector demand. At the JNDA show, we acquired several superb gold 20 yen pieces to offer our clients; not nearly enough, but a real achievement considering the effort involved in finding such desirable specimens.

All-in-all the hunt was an exciting one, and at New England we're extremely pleased with our inventory of Japanese coinage. As well as being a shrewd investment, Japanese coins are among the most beautiful that we've ever had the good fortune to assemble.
